1. Field of the Invention This invention is directed to a method for using contact lens deposits to recover a usable lens from a lens which is to be discarded in the lens production process. The invention is also directed to the lenses recovered as a result of that method, and more particularly, to the lens recovered as a result of the method of the invention having a wet circumferential crystalline zone which produces a lens of enhanced overall optical properties. 2. Prior Art By way of background, contact lenses have been prepared from a variety of materials. Two forms of lens fabrication are commonly used to form rigid gas permeable lenses, namely, lathing and spin casting. A typical lathing process for making gas permeable contact lenses involves a machining of polymethyl methacrylate (PMMA) to the desired lens shape. This polymeric material is commonly referred to as "polymethacrylate", and includes the bulk thermoplastic polymer of the same name. Polymethacrylate is commonly used in all optically clear materials. Typically, the polymethacrylate (usually with a nominal refractive index of about 1.50) is subjected to machining, usually by a cylindrical milling machine, and the "cup" is formed in the polymethacrylate. This cup usually has a diameter of between about 12.5 to 15.0 mm. The ratio of the cup diameter to the arc length of the lens perimeter is known as the "polymethacrylate lens margin" and is a factor of 1.4 times the refractive power of the lens. The polymethacrylate (with a nominal refractive index of 1.50) is then placed in a mold and hardened. This is generally done by thermal polymerization, using elevated temperatures (about 180.degree. C.) and pressures of about 10,000 psi. The hardened lens is then lathed, in the manner just described, and polished or otherwise finished to produce a contact lens having a precise shape and surface characteristics. The resulting lens has an overall index of refraction ranging from about 1.49 to 1.51. In contrast, a spin casting process is also generally known in the art and comprises preparing a monomer for forming a contact lens, injecting the monomer into a mold, and polymerizing or curing the monomer to produce the desired lens. A common polymerization system for this purpose uses ultraviolet radiation. In a
