In a process for manufacturing semiconductor devices, film-forming apparatuses, such as chemical vapor deposition (CVD) apparatus or plasma CVD apparatus, are used for forming a film, which is usually in the form of a thin membrane, on a semiconductor wafer. In order to efficiently use such film-forming apparatuses, it is common practice to combine various kinds of film-forming apparatuses into a cluster, and to make them operate in parallel while controlling the quality of the products formed on the wafers.

A film deposition is performed, in a CVD apparatus for example, by repeating the steps of coating a wafer with a coating liquid, curing the coating liquid on the wafer in a processing chamber, and performing a predetermined heat treatment. Thus, a cluster of apparatuses is constructed in such a manner that the film deposition process can be carried out efficiently. However, even when the cluster of apparatuses is used, there are the following problems left. In the above-mentioned cluster of apparatuses, different kinds of wafers are successively transferred from one processing chamber to another or the processing chambers are arranged in parallel in each of which wafers are successively processed, so that not only the wafer processing time is necessarily shortened, but also the entire processing apparatus may be large in size. When the wafer processing time is shortened, an
