method for dimming the beam of a beam lamp. A vehicular lamp device is proposed in, for example, JP-A-9-163801. This vehicular lamp device includes a first current control element and a second current control element. The first current control element controls the current flowing through the bulb to cause the brightness of the lamp to change depending on a predetermined condition. The second current control element controls the flowing current of the lamp in such a manner that the current flowing through the bulb reaches a predetermined value that is smaller than a maximum value of the bulb current flowing during the normal light emission of the lamp. When the distance between the lamp and an object located ahead of the lamp is short, for example, the second current control element is turned on to reduce the bulb current so that the brightness
